People who have had cancer can still qualify for life insurance, but it will likely be more difficult than before. Getting coverage often depends on the insurance company you're dealing with, since each has different requirements based on the type of cancer you had or how long you've been out of treatment.

Some insurance companies require that you be five or more years out of treatment before issuing you a policy, while others look closely at the type of cancer you had and grant policies based on statistical formulas they maintain.

It's important to research the different companies and to check with your employer, who sometimes can provide a plan as part of your company benefits package.

Employment

For some cancer survivors, looking for a new job or reentering the job market can be a challenging experience. Unless you have physical or mental disabilities that limit the type of work you can do, your experience with cancer shouldn't affect your ability to get a job.

Here are some answers to common questions for workers.

Am I obligated to tell my employer about my cancer diagnosis or medical history?

+

How do I explain a gap in my resume as a result of undergoing cancer treatments?

+

Are there any laws protecting my rights if I feel I am being discriminated against at work?

+

What other employment-related resources are available to me as a cancer survivor?
